Resilient Islands: Securing Water for Sustainable Development in a Changing World

Every two years the IWRA organises the event with a different host island. In 2024, the first hosts were the Faroe Islands, and in 2026, the second host will be Jamaica. The event also focuses on a concrete issue that is relevant for that island, but equally of interest to a global island audience.

Climate change, increasing climate variability, and the growing frequency of extremes are generating complex and far-reaching impacts on island systems. Rising sea levels, saltwater intrusion, prolonged droughts, declining water quality, and altered groundwater recharge are reshaping the way islands manage their water resources. Under higher-warming futures, including worlds exceeding 1.5 °C, freshwater scarcity may increasingly act as a binding constraint on development and a catalyst for social, economic, and ecological change. A changing climate along with changes in demand dynamics has made water security a pressing concern, demanding innovative and adaptive solutions.

Against this background, the 2nd IWRA Islands Water Congress will explore how islands are strengthening resilience through integrated water resource management (IWRM) and Integrated water and wastewater management (IWWM), climate-smart infrastructure, improved monitoring and data management, and nature-based/ ecosystem-based solutions. The 2nd IWRA Islands Water Congress will also be an opportunity to discuss how Jamaica prepared for, responded to, and is undertaking long-term recovery and adaptation following the unprecedented impacts of Hurricane Melissa, a Category 5 event that severely disrupted the country's social, economic, and environmental systems. The Congress will explore the water dimension of Hurricane Melissa, considering not only the performance and resilience of freshwater infrastructure, but also how water governance systems anticipated, coped with, and are adapting to the aftermath of the event.

The 2nd IWRA Islands and Water Congress will be a platform to explore and compare how other island nations and communities have dealt and are preparing themselves to deal with hurricanes and other climate related hazards, from a water perspective.
